

Emergence

EMERGENCE

is precious
the way birth is holy breathing on your own you blink in the light you are here, you are you a smooth emergence takes practice patience, often luck – if I can slip the tube out just as bandage touches skin and your breath mists the mask just so it is a thing of beauty slick, smooth, sweet

I have been kissed within moments I've been hugged and asked Is it over? or even When are they going to start?

anesthesia time is a blackboard eraser sweeping through chalk dust but emergence can be ugly you gag and buck

anything to cough out that tube of life lodged in your throat and I have seen emergence worse than ugly hands in a pus filled belly the surgeon had said Smell that? smells like a tortilla – that's pseudomonas then irrigated, done

I pulled the tube from his throat and with the tube, a scream – an unearthly shriek his chest arched from the table as if a murderer twisted a dagger in his back

I asked Are you in pain? Do you remember anything? but like a shadow deepening to night he whispered No No he said hoarsely I wanted to die emergence is hard I learned that day

if you had embraced oblivion and I pulled you back.
