tency of health care personnel yet enables the licentiates to capture an area of work and protect themselves from competition. This is illustrated by the recent antitrust action by the federal government against the AMA over the accreditation process; the Justice Department contends that it limits competition in health care. Cohen also mentions new regulations that are being instituted to control cost and quality, but points out the difficulties that stand in the way of regulating such complex activities. The possibility of medicine's becoming a public utility for purposes of regulation is hindered by the fact that the utilities often seem to "capture" the bodies organized to regulate them. McGraw's article points out the failure of the planners' hopes that Medicare would provide the basis for the development of professional teams in health care. He believes that in the future medical care and medical education will be in the "matrix mode" and that the traditional academic and professional identity is going out of style. Specific discussions of training for Registered Record Administration, Physical Therapists, Mental Health Workers, and Environmental Health Specialists seem not to agree with the thesis is expounded by McGraw. Rather, it would appear that new personnel are being trained to meet new demands and that their training programs are being continuously upgraded as the groups mature.

Modest as the interest of this volume may be to the practicing anesthesiologist, the education of Allied Health personnel will have a profound effect on our practice in future years.
